Animals that live in the Arctic have found many ways to cope with the cold. Polar bears have two main guards against the cold: extra fur and a layer of fat. These things help keep bears warm in below-freezing temperatures.

Some animals have other ways of handling the cold. Hares and reindeer can run quickly across the snow. That's because their wide "snowshoe" feet don't break through the snow's crust.

Hares in the Arctic also have very small ears. That's because body heat escapes through the ears, cooling the body down. Smaller ears allow less heat to escape.

Some animals, such as whales, birds, and caribou, handle the cold by heading south. They live in the Arctic in the summer, when temperatures are higher.
